

Day #4 - Fontana Lake / Traveling.

Today was a very interesting day. This is definitely one of the more interesting site studies we've done so far. It was a man-made lake, which probably made it very educational for human impact. I was kinda bummed about not being able to do a study on the lake because, being a cartographer and all, it would have been a cool view. Though I was also happy that not doing a site study on the lake meant we had more time to kayak! I loved Kayaking almost as much as I loved WWR (white water rafting). Whenever I go onto the water in any way I always feel nervous/excited/in control. It's kinda a strong combo of feelings but it makes me feel good all the same. The kayaks were wet though, and since I was the second group to go, I got absolutely soaked. It felt nice though since it was so hot outside. After kayaking we ate lunch. It was bagged chicken lunch today, and it tasted great! Not because I'm a huge fan of bagged chicken, but because I was so hungry! The pringles made it all worthwhile though lol! Then we got on the road and started traveling to Goose Creek. The driving was split up into segments so we didn't drive all of it today. It still felt long though. Once we got there, it was pitch black when we set up tents. It was random because we didn't know who was in our tent group yet. Like skydiving bags. KP said.

NEXT PAGE ->